Why Warm Referrals Win

Cold calling is hard. But you already have something far more powerful — existing trust. When you recommend something to a friend, they listen.

10×

More likely to respond

People are 10x more likely to engage with a referral from someone they trust vs. a cold pitch

$800+

Avg monthly fees saved

The average TechSavvy merchant saves over $800/month — a real, tangible benefit you're sharing

$0

Cost to the merchant

No monthly fees, no contracts, no setup costs. There's genuinely nothing for them to lose

Your advantage: You're not a stranger. You're a friend sharing a money-saving tip.

- Key mindset: You're not selling. You're doing them a favor by sharing something that eliminates a hidden cost they're already paying.

The 5-Step Approach

1. Identify
   Pick someone you know who owns or manages a business that accepts cards

2. Open with Curiosity
   Ask a simple question about what they're paying — not a pitch

3. Share the Benefit
   Tell them what TechSavvy eliminates in one clear sentence

4. Offer the Connection
   Ask if they'd be open to a free, no-commitment analysis

5. Hand Them Off
   Send their info to TechSavvy — your job is done

STEP 1

Identify Your Best Targets

Not every business owner is the right first conversation. Start with people most likely to benefit and most likely to trust you.

Best candidates to approach first:

- Restaurants & food service — High card volume = high fees every month
- Retail shops & boutiques — Often on old processors with hidden fees
- Auto repair & service shops — Steady card transactions, rarely audited
- Salons, spas & wellness — Small businesses that never check processing costs
- Any business taking cards — If they swipe cards, TechSavvy can save them money

Your personal checklist:

- ☐ Write down 10 business owners you personally know
- ☐ Mark which ones accept credit or debit cards
- ☐ Prioritize anyone who has mentioned tight margins or costs
- ☐ Add 3 names to your outreach list for this week

STEP 2

Open with Curiosity, Not a Pitch

The goal of your first sentence is NOT to explain TechSavvy. It's to start a conversation. A simple question does this better than any pitch.

Curiosity openers that work:

"Hey, random question — do you know what your effective credit card processing rate is?"

Works because: It's genuinely curious, low-pressure, and most owners don't know the answer.

"Quick question — has anyone ever gone line by line through your merchant statement with you?"

Works because: Almost no one has. The answer is almost always "no" — which opens the door perfectly.

"Do you know if you're locked into a contract with your current processor?"

Works because: It surfaces pain without mentioning your solution yet.

What NOT to say first:

- ✗ "Hey I work for TechSavvy now, want to switch processors?" — Feels like a pitch immediately
- ✗ "I can save you money on fees" — Sounds like every salesperson they've heard
- ✗ "TechSavvy is the best processor in Hawaii" — Leads with the product, not their problem

Share, Offer & Hand Off

STEP 3

Share the Benefit

Once they answer your opener, share the benefit in one sentence. Keep it simple.

> "I've been working with TechSavvy Hawaii — they eliminate processing fees for most businesses. Most owners save $800–$2,000 a month. I immediately thought of you."

Benefit first. Personal connection at the end. Nothing else.

Don't explain how it works. Don't mention terminals. Just the outcome: they save money.

STEP 4

Offer the Connection

Close with one low-pressure question that makes the next step clear.

> "Would you be open to a free 10-minute analysis? No commitment — they just show you exactly what you're paying vs. what you could be paying."

Free + no commitment = very easy yes.

If they say yes — send their name and number to TechSavvy. Your job is done.

STEP 5

Hand Off to TechSavvy

Text TechSavvy: "[Name], [Business], [Phone] — open to a free analysis." That's it. TechSavvy closes the rest. You earn when they sign up.

When & How to Reach Out

Text Message

Best channel

Feels personal and non-threatening. Business owners respond to texts faster than calls or emails.

Best for: anyone you already text

Phone Call

High impact

More personal than text. Have your opener memorized before calling.

Best for: close relationships

In Person

Most powerful

A casual mention in conversation is the most natural approach of all.

Best for: chance encounters

Email / DM

Low pressure

Works for acquaintances you haven't spoken with recently.

Best for: professional contacts

Best time to reach out: Tuesdays–Thursdays, 10am–2pm. Avoid Mondays and Fridays. Mid-morning is when business owners are most open to new conversations.
